Salaam Dunk

This documentary film brings us into the day-to-day lives, dreams, and frustrations of the women's basketball team at the American University of Iraq, Sulaimani (AUIS). We follow these young women and their coach through their third season as they try to develop both their skills as ball players and deal with the complex experiences they’ve had during the war. For these team members, who grew up during wartime in a restrictive society, basketball represents freedom and possibility.

BACKGROUND INFORMATION

This film takes place in 2010, seven years after the U.S. invasion of Iraq with the official goal of toppling dictator Saddam Hussein. Although the U.S. Army ousted Hussein fairly quickly, U.S. forces remained in Iraq until 2011 because of an insurgency (rebellion). Insurgents opposed U.S. intervention and the new Iraqi government. Although the numbers are still debated, by some estimates nearly half a million (500,000) Iraqis died in this war, many of them civilians. Many students at American University of Iraq, Sulaimani moved to the area to escape the violence in Baghdad. The students featured in this film are Arab, Kurdish, and Christian, groups that historically don’t get along in Iraq. The Kurds were an oppressed minority under Saddam Hussein.

WORDS TO KNOW

• B-roll: Supplemental film footage that can be used to edit a scene. B-roll is the footage used to cut away from an interview to help tell a story.

• Establishing Shot: Usually the first shot of a new scene, designed to show the audience where the action is taking place. It is usually a very wide shot or extreme wide shot.

• Point of View Shot: A section of footage that shows what a character (the subject) sees (represented through the camera).

• Vérité Footage: Documentary footage of characters going about their everyday lives as if the camera isn't there.

Clues and Cues

Pay attention while watching

• Notice when the subjects of the film seem aware of the camera.

• Listen to the soundtrack. How does it create a shift in mood?

• Notice the filmmakers’ use of special effects. What is their goal?
Girls in the U.S. had to fight to get equal funding for their sports teams and now there's a law called Title IX, which says it's illegal to discriminate against girls' sports. Do you think girls' sports are taken as seriously as boys' sports? Are there barriers in your school and community for girls who want to play sports?

In the film, when some girls arrived to the first practice, they were wearing high heels and couldn't run. Remember the interviews on the street in the first few minutes of the documentary about women in sports. Based on those interviews, why do you think some girls arrived so unprepared to play basketball? Why were the girls embarrassed about running outside? Why don't girls run in public in Iraq?

Ryan believes that basketball is about more than playing ball. What does Ryan believe basketball teaches? Why is basketball so meaningful for the different characters? What does it mean to them beyond learning a sport?

How does the team help Kurdish, Arab and Muslim girls get past their stereotypes about each other? Have you had similar experiences on a team or through some other activity such as a play, camp, community service project, etc.?

Even though this documentary is about the basketball team, it's also about the after effects of the war in Iraq. What did you learn about that war through this film?

Right before the title there's a shot of a girl running towards the camera and dunking. How does that shot make you feel about women in sports? Would this shot be as powerful from a different camera angle? What other techniques do the filmmakers use to create different feelings in the audience? Think about the times when they speed up, slow down, use music, etc. For example, what mood do the soundtrack and the song “Kush Kush” create?

Although a documentary film is a representation of real life, the filmmakers choose what to shoot, edit out, and include. What story did they choose to tell? Were there other stories that you wish had been included? For example, did you want to know more about a certain character, or hear about someone not actually given a voice? Could they have structured the documentary in a different way?

Storyboarding Everyday Life
Materials: Storyboard printout (available from pcffri.com/FilmHub) or blank pieces of paper, pencils
Documentaries create one particular version of real life. Working in a small group or individually, create a storyboard of your year in school. How would you plot out your year in this classroom? What were some dramatic moments? Were there any struggles or achievements? Frustrations? A storyboard is a graphic organizer for a film, sort of like a comic book. After making your storyboard, share it! Discuss the different “plots” chosen by each group. Why did you include certain events and leave out others? Whose point of view are you representing? Whose point of view are you excluding?

Playing with Perspective
Materials: Camera or a phone with a camera
Think about the image right before the credits of a girl dunking the ball. Because the image is shot from below—a low angle—she looks strong and powerful. Take your own pictures of people and practice using similar techniques to create different feelings for your audience about your characters.

Writing Prompts

Option 1: Write a letter to Coach Ryan after he moves back to the U.S., filling him in on your life and your feelings about basketball as if you were one of the main characters in the movie. Incorporate what you know about your character’s history.

Option 2: Have you ever had a meaningful experience playing sports? What did you learn from that experience? Were your experiences similar to or different from the experiences of the girls in the film?
